Police officers are often seen at the scene of a crime, but they are not always the first to arrive. In many cases, the first person to arrive is a witness or a victim. The police then arrive and take over the investigation. They will talk to the witness and the victim, and they will look for evidence. They will also try to identify the person who committed the crime. This is often a difficult task, but the police are trained to do it. They will use their knowledge and experience to help them solve the crime.

2. The 1991 paper assumed that only a small fraction of the total population would be vaccinated against measles. This assumption was based on the fact that the vaccine was not available in all countries and that the vaccine was expensive.
